Course description

Dramatically and unexpectedly, Central Asia was thrust to independence in 1991. Of all the Soviet republics, the five of Central Asia – Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan – had been the largest net recipients of Soviet aid, had benefited most economically from the Soviet Union and had thus been the most reluctant to break from the Soviet empire. Once the path of independence was followed, each of these five states faced considerable ethnic, state, economic, social and foreign policy challenges. New attention to Central Asia after 9/11, including a Western military presence, has also focused minds on whether the region is at serious threat from Islamist radicalism. This module aims to analyse these nation- and state-building agendas, seeking to address critically some of the now widely held assumptions about this post-Soviet area. Located in one of the world's most strategic zones, between Russia, China and a troubled Middle East, Central Asia relies on its substantial human and natural resources in the renegotiation of its geopolitical status.

Aims

The module aims to provide students with a strong understanding of the role of the Russian and Soviet legacies in shaping the trajectory and form of post-Soviet transformation; the inter-twined nature of the various dimensions of post-Soviet transformation (political, economic, cultural, social); the main traditional and human security challenges facing the five Central Asian republics; and the geo-strategic significance of Central Asia and the interaction between actors internal and external to the region.

Aims

The course's main aim is to provide students with a strong understanding of:

- The role of the Russian and Soviet legacies in shaping the trajectory and form of post-Soviet transformation;
- the inter-twined nature of the various dimensions of post-Soviet transformation (political, economic, cultural, social);
- the main traditional and human security challenges facing the five Central Asian republics;
- the geo-strategic significance of Central Asia and the interaction between actors internal and external to the region.

Learning outcomes

By the end of the course students will:

- ✓ acquire a firm understanding of the key political and international developments in Central Asia since 1991;
- ✓ critically engage with post-communist transition literature and its relevance for Central Asia;
- ✓ apply their knowledge of comparative foreign policies and democratisation to this region and demonstrate their appreciation of the domestic/foreign policy nexus.
